This three story high, two bay wide brick building is at the end of a row at a corner site. The "half-hipped" roof was masked by a parapet at some point to modernize the appearance of the building.

The first floor front facade was altered at some point to meet the needs of a storefront church. Stucco conceals the running bonded brick. A sixteen light window was cut into the facade; now it and the ground level entrance-way have been boarded. Second floor windows are flat with wooden sills and lintels. Third floor windows are segmental arched with wooden sills and brick lintels. The parapet rises above with two fake ventilator grills. Most of the cornice has been removed.

The side is fenestrated with a variety of flat and segmental arched windows and doorways. A three bay deep, two story high brick addition supports a fish-scaled, asbestos shingled frame addition at the third floor level. A set of sloping wooden cellar doors covers the sidewalk basement entrance, and two doorless coal shutters puncture the basement wall.

The "half-hipped" roof of the building actually consists of a shed roof running down from the party wall, to the side wall with breaks at the peak which run to the front and rear walls. Squat flat chimneys pierce the roof along the party wall of the front and middle rooms. An additional, brick arch covered stack rises from the roof above the back rooms.

BUILDER/ARCHITECT

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The form of corner buildings often varies from that of houses within a row because of opportunities peculiar to corner siting. In this case a hipped roof was used to afford more usable third floor space. It was later masked in front by a Victorian modernization. Because light was accessible through the side wall, 1045 was built back to the lot line unlike the other houses on the block. Also because of its corner siting, this structure, at some point, came to accommodate commercial use.
